PTST = Perception Throughout Space and Time

I've proposed the name PTST for an underlying characteristic of our universe, which facilitates ESP and can be proven through your own experience. To my knowledge it has until now not been formulated by physicists. And it's important to underline that we are talking about what is perceivable for our conscious minds – not more, and not less.

- Perception

Perception beyond the five materially based senses in the conscious mind of the being making the experience. PTST covers factual information and also mind to mind communication. A fascinating question has just been implied: The role of mind in Existence.

- Throughout Space

PTST is independent of separation in space. ESP regarding events on Earth can often be verified, be it on the other side of the Earth. But that's a minute distance compared with the vastness of space. In book one I wrote at some length about my personal experiences spanning our galaxy. Therefore I understand "Throughout Space" to include at least the volume of our Milky Way galaxy.

- and Time

My own ESP experiences span the subjective present and thousands of years into the past – given the appropriate keys to mediate the experience. The subjective future has not been any part of my experiences. But seen logically, conscious beings in the far distant future could reach back in time in their perception and perceive everything which went before. In this sense, I see the description "Throughout Time" as justified.

Perception Keys

With a limitless amount of things which could be (but normally are not) perceived, we usually need some sort of key to guide the placement of our attention to a particular event, individual or item of information. Anything can function as a key to the past through which it has existed – a family heirloom, the physical presence of an individual (person, dog, tree...), or a geographic location such as a crime scene, battle field, grave, burial mound and so on. These things I call perception keys. In fact, every object is a key to its own past – but most objects, such as a pebble, a piece of concrete, a drop of water, the cutlery we eat with – will offer connection to a realm so remote in its' nature to our own that we don't latch on. Furthermore, family relationship (genetic and marital) can also act as a perception key, as is demonstrated by family constellations.

The block universe

It is a proven prediction of special relativity that the space and time which we live in are not two separate things but one, the spacetime. The flow of time depends on the velocity of the observer, and only observers with the same position and velocity will agree in their observations of the time at which events at remote places occur. This is all totally counter-intuitive to our everyday experience, but true nonetheless. The peak of all this weirdness is that all of space and time exist, with fixed content – including that which from our personal perspective lies in the future. This is so because there will always be some position and velocity from which any point in space and time can be observed. This is what physicists mean when they talk about the block universe. And as Sabine Hossenfelder points out (in 'Existential Physics'), your deceased grandmother is, seen in this way, just as much alive as you are now.

The foundation of spacetime

The four-dimensional spacetime in which we exist is not the primordial ground of Existence; rather it is produced by, or emerges from, a deeper level of existence – the foundational level. Almost all physicists agree that something underlies our material universe, but while ideas about it abound, none could yet be proven to be the correct idea.

There are some aspects of the foundational level which, viewed from our own experience in our spacetime universe, are deeply counter-intuitive:

- Since spacetime emerges from the foundational level, space and time as we know them can't both be present at the foundational level. The entanglement phenomenon in quantum mechanics, by which two entangled particles reflect a measurement on one of them irrespective of their separation, shows that spatial separation can't exist at the foundational level. And some theories of the foundational level propose that at that level, time as we know it also doesn't exist. To understand this is critical to understanding the lack of limitations on ESP – in both space and time.
- All the material which exists in our spacetime is also founded on that deeper level – every field, every subatomic particle, every atom. This means that all beings, which all consist of matter, all exist primarily at the foundational level – and that's true for people, animals, trees and plants.
- So whatever you might like to view as the seat of your consciousness – your brain, your abdominal brain, or your whole body – exists primarily at the foundational level. There is also the possibility that our consciousnesses themselves sit primarily, or even solely, in the foundational level. In either case, at that level our minds potentially have access to all events throughout space and time. I'm including time in that last assertion, since it is my own repeated experience.

In books one and three I'm proposing that various phenomena, such as aura and chakras, chi, nadis and also morphogenetic fields and other types of morphic fields, exist solely in the foundational level. Some of them (aura, chakras) have locational aspects, while others are amorphous (morph* fields). What they all have in common is, that although they exist only at the foundational level, with no emergent properties of their own in spacetime, they have profound effects on things which do emerge – in particular for living beings.
